PSYCHIATRY: JOURNAL FOR THE STUDY OF INTERPERSONAL PROCESSES seeks to provide a medium for effective communication between psychiatry, the social sciences, and all other branches of the study of man and his individual and collective problems in living. The journal is addressed to all serious students of these problems, to all who are applying current remedial measures, and to all who are searching for more effective solutions. The aim is to encourage an integrative and truly cumulative growth of knowledge by facilitating mutual understanding among various disciplines and overcoming tendencies toward insularity. The journal attempts to be broadly communicative without sacrificing technical quality. It is designed to present accounts of clinical and field observations, reports of original research, surveys and critiques of scientific literature, and studies concerning methodology, epistemology, and philosophy. The Foundation, its Trustees, and the Editor can accept no responsibility for any statement of fact or opinion made by the contributors.
